The Journey Home was an American television series that aired on the Public Broadcasting Service network from 1997 to 1999. Produced by the Coming Home Network International, it was created by Marcus Grodi, who was the host of the show. The show was set in Mineral, Virginia, and followed the lives of the guests at The Journey Home, a non-profit transitional home for veterans who were struggling with various issues such as mental health, addiction, and poverty. The show aimed to provide hope and inspiration to those who were facing challenging circumstances and to highlight the importance of providing support and resources to veterans. The Journey Home was praised for its compassionate approach to storytelling and for its focus on the human element of the veterans' experiences. The show was later rebranded as My Journey Home, and it continues to be produced by the Coming Home Network International.
